Not illustrated. 1905 Excerpt: ... Emperor. The army then sent a deputation, demanding a truce for sparing the further effusion of human blood. The Duke answered, their King might spare it when reseated on his throne; but that Foe Them, and From Them, the application was now too late. After all this, in the park, whither I went to breathe an instant at its epoch of real emptiness, five oclock, I met our old friend le voisin, M. de Boursac.1 Le Voisin tells me le Duc de Bourbon has been all this time in Spain, but is now certainly in La Vendee. M. d'Angouleme was still in Spain at the last news. He had escaped the same day that we did; but ces dames sont toujours a Paris. I believe he is with M. le Prince de Conde. He told me further news:--That in les chambres various voices had demanded army intelligence, and where was the Emperor. At first the ministers present said les nouvelles were not mauvaises, and the Empereur was with his army; but being hard and hardily pressed, Carnot acknowledged all to be bad, and the Emperor in Paris! After much discussion, contention, and violence, a majority took imperious lead, and declared Bonaparte dechu. A committee was then formed to make a proposal to the Allies. Three took the lead, and said they would offer any sacrifice to recover peace--resign the Emperor, become a republic, take another and new form of government, or revert to a free monarchy--anything for peace, except reinstating the late power! Oh mon ami! I hope entirely false, that one of these three is one of our most valued friends, M. de la Fayette! Difficulties, contrarieties, factions, mischiefs, we must expect and meet with fortitude; but one voice, clear and universal, in a chorus angelical cries, affirms, and confirms, that the armies fight no more! If you were to see me i...
